THE GRAVE:

The Secret of Dunraven Castle.

BY ANNIE ASHMORE, Author of "Faithful Margaret," Etc., Etc

CHAPTER IX-(Continued.) In those days, when the shadow of the Inture was slowly overspreading my sky, I had one sweet consolation; then, as now, my little Ulva gave me the balm of her pure affection, and her father's heart and mine could still meet in our love for her.

At that time England was much vexed by Eastern questions; rival tribes were many conflicting claims were made which it was difficult to judge between. At length it was decided to send a secret agent, accredited by the government, to the scene of trouble, to gather the real rights of the several claimants before England should enter into the negotiations with either side. Lord incheape was the choice of the cabinet; statecraft and indomitable courage were requisites for the desicate mission, and in these my lord was deemed highly gifted.

It was sadly significant of the distance which was daily widening between our spirits, that my lord at first made his arrangements for going on his embassy by himself, and could hardly be got to believe that his wife preferred to be by his side.

"You mistake the nature of the journey," he remonstrated; "I do not travel with pomp and ceremony as the envoy of a powerful nation; there are reasons why I should go as quietly and quickly as possible. I shall take no attendants, and I shall follow the obscurest routes." "So much the better," I cried; "we shall be the more together, and I shall be your only attendant, more loving and faithful than any you ever had before!" "Engelonde, I do not require this hard duty of you.

Oh. Raleigh, my husband, were you blind?

"I must go with you-do not -do not forbid me!" I prayed with bursting heart. "Why will you deem my wifely love self-sacrifice? I have no life a part from yours. Do not forbid me to go with you." And my lord was silenced; he permitted his child wife to creep within the closing fortress of his heartalmost to take her old place there—only for that shadow of doubt which ever hovered between. Yet even that half victory was joy unspeakable for me; and as I saw myself included in his every plan, all heaven seemed opening before me—a heaven of hope where doubt would flee away forever. I was happy— BADDY!

We confided our Ulva to the loving protection of her mother's kindred, the old Countess of Rothaye, and bade farewell to the shores of England, for me a long farewell. And now I was my husband's constant companion, no other came between us; he leaned on me—he looked deep into my heart and almost recognized the only image there to be his own; he must have come to trust me wholly very soon. Ah! I should have died then!

We had reached that great Oriental city where he had arranged to leave me, the rest of his journey was through a hostile territory, and it would have been folly for me to wish to hamper him with my presence. Four persons had gone from our household ahead of us to prepare a residence for me; my lord and I had journeyed incognito, avoiding in every way the recognition of any one who might indentify our persons or rank, for great interests depended upon the secrecy of the mission.

We found a pleasant residence in the suburbs of the city ready for us, and a modest household installed, all was appropriate to the style of well-to-do commoners, which was the disguise we had adopted. The four persons I refer to adopted. were: Mr. John Sircombe, who had been my lord's traveling tutor in his youth, and his secretary since; he was now placed at the head of my establishment is director in my lord's absence. The second was Kenmore, a noble old Highlander and my lord's body servant; then came Mary, my maid, a simple, kind creature who loved me well; and Nathan, Mr. Sircombe's man, a shrewd fellow, like his master.

From the first moment that I had met Mr. Sircombe's cold, grudging eye when my lord presented him to his bride at Inchcape Fosse, I had never liked him I felt rather than saw duplicity under that smooth exterior, yet, as my lord placed great confidence in him I was asbamed of my dislike and never whispered it; so that my dear lord thought he pleased me well when he gave me his secretary for a guardian in his absence. and I accepted him in silence, hoping that I might have no need of a faithful

We found letters from England awaiting us which announced an important amendment in the programme. Inchcape was to have a colleague to share the dangers of his mission, and an officer who had local knowledge of the territory in question, and who could guide the envoy by the shortest and safest route. This gentleman whose name was not mentioned, was to wait upon my lord immediately upon his ar-

We were in the garden, my lord and I. when the colleague came; the splendor of the tropical verdure was unrolled around us; we were alone, we two, strolling hand in hand among the roses; no sound was heard save our own low. loving voices; love, sweet as the incense ese surrounding blossoms, was in our hearts. It was the last moment that love lived between us; already the feet that were to trample it dead were at the gate.

A carriage rolled into the court, a guard in blazing uniform rode about it. "Alas! my brother envoy is here," said my husband, regretfully, "we must start within the hour, sweet Engelonde, we must part!" You pressed your beloved lips to mine, my husband, for the last time-the last time! oh, Raleigh! Through the scented alleys we heard him come-I lifted up mine eyes-my eart stood still-it was Col. Accrington, my insulting lover-my husband's enemy. What thought you of your young wife's sudden start and pallor? Alasi for Engelonde, that hovering doubt came closer then. On he came, tall, hauchty, with his noble air, his impassive countenance; nearer, nearer, his measured step trod upon my heart-feet of brass! came to a He looked up. dead stop-the hue of ceath passed upon his bronzed check. "You of all the teeming world!" he I felt the shock that thrilled through my busband as I clung, half sinking, to nis arm; he scanned each conscious face all unconscious of the terrible evil she with pitiless inquisition, but not a word.

"Yes, it is I, Col. Accrington," I retorted, stung into defiance by pain; "and why not I? Am I the first wife who has found her happiness in wandering the world over by her husband's

"Perhaps not," replied he, demon prompted; "nor are you the last poor mortal who will wander the world over in search of lost peace, as I have done,

My lord's brow darkened as the odious picture rose before him of two sad hearts roaming the world over in search of a balm that might heal the wounds of a hopeless, an unlawful love.
I could not defend myself against the unjust thought in that hated presence, and retired. From my windows I watched the two brother envoys pacing to and fro; I need not have feared that Lord Inchcape would forget his duty to his country to demand private satisfac-tion for personal injuries. They dis-cussed business, coldly, courteously, with the infernal fires of jealousy be-

How changed was my wicked lover's haughty beauty, how blurred by mental strife, how marred by the triumph of evil! Yet I may judge him harshly; he had seen service among the barbarians since he lounged among us in silken dalliance, and had borne peril and hard-ship bravely for England's sake; who shall say that he had not been suffering withering remorse and shame because of his fall from honor? Ay, who shall say, when suffering had not taught him mercy and he wittingly sowed misery betwixt my lord and me!

Alone, I pondered how I might save our happiness. We two, so united by truest love, surely we could never be sundered by a mere mistake? Should I now confide that long withheld secret, which had been the only disturber of our peace, leaving my husband to deal with the matter as he judged best? Ah! how I longed to do that! How weary I was of standing in my own poor strength!

But I dared not. What madness, to set two fierce men at enmity, on the eve of a mission which they must undertake together! A revelation now would too likely rupture the whole scheme; my lord would be less than human if he could postpone the punishment of his wife's insulter.

Silence, at any cost!
But, thought I, surely I may appeal to my husband's love, to trust me despite appearances,—or to await expla-nation until his return? And with this hope I supported myself till he should come to bid me farewell.

I watched them part for the time, the colonel strode to the gates, where his cortege waited, my lord entered the house. Slowly he ascended the marble stairs,-was he coming straight to his unhappy Engelonde, to take her in loving arms, and to win from her the truth with generous forbearance?

Slowly, heavily he paced onwardpassed my chamber door-oh, love! was it well? and entering his private apart ment, locked it upon all the world, and

Shut out Judged, condemed, bereft of even one chance of vindication. Was it well, my Lord Inchcape?

In stupid misery I remained where I was, and the precious moments fled away forever. The sound of the horses' hoofs, as Kenmore brought them to the door, roused me at last. In sudden panic I hurried to my husband's door, and knocked till, against his will, he opened. He started back when he saw that it was his wife who would not be denied, then led me in with cruel punctiliousness.

I threw myself at his feet. You have no cause in me for anger or sorrow. Oh, Raleigh, lift me to your heart again!" I pleaded. "I have not accused you," said my lord, "Rise; that is not the attitude of a guiltless wife." How austere: each word a morsel of ice! I wondered at its cruelty. I had yet to learn that jealousy is cruel as the grave. "I kneel for justice, not for mercy," answered proudly; "look in my true eyes and say that you can doubt my loyal love for you." He gazed into my eyes— he was moved; what blight was on him that he could foster doubt even yet?

"Fain would I believe in your love for me as much as you believe in it," said "but I have seen you sinking under the weary strife of your heart against honor. I am too old for you; you wish to be true to me, you are true to me, as I believe, in act and thought, but you are dying of the struggle." "And you suspect my heart of straying from you to that man?" I cried derisively.

Just then came a hurried knock, my maid Mary was seeking her mistress to deliver a letter which she had been ordered to place in my own hand; too simple to divine the intended secrecy of the transaction, she had brought it to me thus.

My lord handed me the letter with a bitter sneer; it was from Colonel Accrington, I knew the hand at once, I was stricken dumb by the calamitous conjunction of circumstances.

"Allow me to leave you, madam, to the perusal of your admirer's rhapso-dies," taunted Lord Incheape. I sprang after him, I thrust the loathed thing in-"Open and read, and deal with the writer as he merits," I implored, my courage fainting under his unjust dis-And then the thought that I had delivered up my lord to destruction pierced my heart, and wrung a moan of anguish from my lips. My lord's fierce hand paused ere he had broken the seal-he regarded me with a sardonic

"You repent of your candor?" ques

"Only for your dear sake!" I mouned "And partly for your friend's, eh?" mocked my cruel love; "very well, second thoughts are often best. Should l read this billet-doux to-day I should be hampered with an affair of honor before we start upon our mission. Duty for bids the gratification of my private and mosities until I return; therefore I will postpone that pleasure for the present. He locked the letter within his desk and secured the kev.

The call of the bugle rang gayly, Kenmore knocked, announcing the cortege to be in waiting; my lord turned a long strange gaze upon his suspected wife who stretched out her arms for one last embrace in speechless agitation-but stretched them forth in vain.

"When I return-if you are worthy, muttered he.

"Oh. God! you cannot leave me thus!" whispered. But he could; he did leave me, with out a glance of love's relenting. He was gone; my love. my life! Gone with the light shiver of harness, and the clash of arms, with the thunder of cavalry and the gay bugle call; gone with doubt of his Engelonde in his breast, and a hated rival by his side, whose dearest desire it must be to see his death.

I fell forward on my face as one stricken to earth.

Two voices speaking by the door aroused me; believing me still uncon-scious, Mr. Sircombe, the director of my household, was questioning my maid concerning the letter which had passed between Colonel Accrington and Lady Incheape. By the insidious form of his inquiries, I perceived with indignation suspect the worst of his benefactor's wife. I stirred, he retired: and the gir! Suspect the truth," I preed. But he only had done me, waited upon me affection-

Kenmore had accompanied his master. Afterwards I discovered that it was had been bribed by Colonel Accrington to carry a clandestine letter to me. That Mr. Sircombe had contrived that through the simplicity of my maid it should be delivered to me in the presence of my lord, and that Mr. Sircombe's object in questioning the maid was to infuse doubts of her mistress' fidelity into her mind, that I might be judged and condemned by my household.

Mr. Sircombe had never welcomed a mistress to his patron's house, his had been the post of confidential adviser to Lord Inchcape too long for him to give t up gracefully.

Night fell, the first which had seen my lord sundered from me.

In that lonely suburb perfect silence reigned; I lingered on the balcony out-side my chamber windows hour by hour, heedless of the passage of the night, abandoning myself to my sorrow. While I watched and prayed there came to me from afar the light beat of horses' hoofs-I almost thought it fancy, for who could be coming to me out of the heart of the hot, sweet tropic night, whose golden moon shone on all I loved many a long league away?

But it was no fancy—on it came, I heard the shiver of harness, the clash of armor; a horseman was galloping toward me: through the dense foliage caught the blue glimmer of steel as he rode up to the gate. A dark pre-sentiment rooted me to the spot. I thought that the foes had fought, that my lord was wounded or slain, and that Kenmore had returned to tell the Clinging to the marble balustrade I awaited the coming of the messenger. He dismouted at the gate, and strode through the clustering shadows of the gardens; I shook out my handkerchief in mad impatience, and he swerved and came toward me. But it was not the rugged form of old Kenmore that burst from the shadowy alleys into the lambent moonshine. It was my wicked lover, it was his face, worn and desperate, which looked up at me.

"Hush!" he murmured again, "and do not taunt me—be more merciful. Why did you not answer my letter? Had you done so I would not have been goaded to this madness. No, madam, I have not deserted my post; I have but left the camp where my Lord Inchcape sleeps in peace-I hope to return before I am missed. Lady Inchcape, I cannot leave you—it may be forever—without your forgiveness. For that I sued you in my letter, for that I have ventured back here to-night. Ah, be kind for once, and give me one gentle word!" In soft, imploring tones he spoke, and the haggard weariness of his upraised face might have touched me but for the memory of the suffering he had brought upon my lord.

"There can be no kindness between you and me; you have dared to write me a clandestine letter. Well, listen to me; I have not read it. You have come in the depth of night to pay me a com-promising visit—you shall gain nothing by that but a disgraceful exposure. I shall call my household to protect me from the insulting presence of a midnight intruder."

"One such call and you are ruined!" said he, fiercely. "Beware; you can turn my love to hate, and goad me on to seek revenge." "I defy you-do your worst!" I cried, turning away.

"Do you indeed deliver up my Lord Inchcape to my vengeance?" exclaimed he laughing; "thanks, fair coquette, for carte blanche."

But while I heard the menace in trembling dread, his words were checked by the sound of galloping hoofs. lord has waked," he went on with sudden deadly calmness, "has missed his colleague—has permitted jealous suspi-cion to enter his breast—has deserted his post in his turn to enact the role of private petective. He is come-he finds his mourning wife amuzing herself with the balcony scene a la Romeo and Juliet -now for a sensation that will make the world wonder!" Surely my reason must have forsaken me that I stood there in that damning presence, to be discovered by a jealous lord. Why did I not fly, call up Mr. Sircombe, my maid, any one, rather than to cling to the fatal spot in a trance of terror at the meeting of the enemies? And it was my lord who sprang from his steed, and burst through the scented jungle to confront Colonel Accrington, who with folded arms and a taunting smile awaited him under my balcony. Oh, my lord! my lord! had the throb-bings of my heart been words, you would have known that you had no cause for the fury which turned your wholesome blood to gall! But appearances were so black-so black, and I could utter no word.

A mockery or two bandied between them, a muttered phrase, and they moved away together, the colonel waving his hand in jaunty adieu to me; but Lord Inchcape had no single look or word for his suspected wife. The shadows swallowed them up.

Then my locked senses stirred. I fled to summon my lord's secretary; he opened to my loud knocking. He was fully dressed, as I had thought, and had been listening to all that was said, at his open window; confusion and dismay were imprinted on his visage.

"Mr. Sircombe," I said, "you, who have heard what passed between Colonel Accrington and me, know how little cause there is for my lord to be jealous; go and give your testimony to him, you will prevent bloodshed.'

He went out, but with tardy steps, hesitating, biting his nails, his busy brain scheming as he went, his furtive eye scanning me. The clash of rapiers guided us to the combatants, but before we could reach them one had fallen. It was my lord. The victor was wiping his blade.

Kenmore raised his master's head upon his knee, I threw myself on the ground beside him with outstretched hands, but a stern voice cried out, "not you, Lady Inchcape," it was the secretary's. Kenmore heard the insult offered me, and uttered a bitter cry of indignation. Colonel Accrington sprang to support me, regardless of my loathing repulse.

"It is too late now for resistance," he whispered, "they all believe you guilty; they drive you into my arms."

"Away, craven," I cried thrusting him from me with superhuman strength, will you descend so far as even to act a lie? No one knows my innocence so well as you—will you deign to play a part like this poor wretch—my lord's While they shrank and scowled in shame the noble old Highlander mited his broad bonnet, crying fervently: "Now God be praised, I know you are wronged, my guiltless lady!" and then he turned and cursed my base traducers, so that they skulked apart abashed. At this moment my lord opened his eyes upon me with a stifled cry of wrath.

"Retire, madam," said he sternly, "what do you here? False heart, begone! These cruel words awoke my crushed spirit, honor forbade submission then. "My lord, as God hears me you do me afoul wrong," I answered proudly. "My heart has never beat save for yon." I waved forward Colonel Accrington. "As shrugged his shoulders with a motion of THE LATEST OUT. light appeal. "A base revenge, this, sir, which brands you liar and coward." I retorted. I detained the secretary, who to withhold your testimony!" I said.

cant eye—he was mute.

lust's revenge.

He looked upon the ground with va-

I heard my lord's insane burst of laughter, while the red blood gushed anew from his side; and then I fell down smitten to the heart by love's cruelty and My lord's wound was deep and dangerous, for many weeks he lay in helpless suffering, incapable of defending his interests, and that was the time Colonel Accrington took to compass his ruin.

He had taken from my lord all the papers connected with the embassy, and departed, accompanied by his own servant, to accomplish the work which had been confided to Lord Inchcape.

I was alike beyond the reach of sorrow or shame, the shock of that night had thrown me into a languishing fever, in which for many sad days delirium lured and mocked me with visions of lost happiness; but my lucid intervals were spent in humble prayer. I earnestly examined my great love to see of what blemish I might purify it, so that God might have pity upon me and give me back my husband's.

Alas! wherein was I lacking, that I got no deliverance at all?

My lord recovered sufficiently to travel before I knew one face from another-he had received orders to return to England instantly, and he obeyed. Mr. Sircombe accompanied him—better would it have been for me if he had never obtained the ear of Inchape again, for my destruction was now become necessary to his tenure of office, and too well I know that he wielded a malign influence over my lord's mind with regard to the

Not till months had passed and my health was restored, did I learn the calamity which had befallen my Lord Incheape through his fatal delusion that night. Colonel Accrington had taken a foul revenge, his baseness to wards me was transcended far by the incredible treacnery with which he os-trayed Lord Inchape. Colonel Accrington had accomplished, with brilliant success, the mission which had been confided to my lord, he had returned to England to report his success, and when questioned concerning the sin-gular disappearance of his principal from the scene of action, had boldly stated that Lord Inchape and he had started on the expedition together, that Lord Inchape had turned back after a few hours' riding, on private business of his own, and that he had been left to were showered upon the successful envoy, the deserter from his post was summoned before the Oriental commission to What explanation had my lord to My lord had no explanation to offer, as his enemy well knew. The truth would have blotted out his fault, and blasted his adversary-but to tell the truth would have been to smirch the reputation of his wife.

"My lords," said he to his frowning conferrees, "honor compels me to silence;

I can only say that Richard Accrington and I have played a deadly game, and

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

CURIOUS FACTS.

There are five States of the German Empire each smaller than Rhode Socrates was said to remember the

When shad first made their appear-

Jonabad Almanor, the famous linguist, could converse in twenty-

Beethoven could remember any selection of music he had ever heard

The practice of clay eating is common throughout the torrid zone, and is not unknown in Sweden, Norway,

Dead bodies, when taken as cargo on a ship, are always described as either statuary or natural history specimens, owing chiefly to the super-

Wheat can be grown in the Alps at an elevation of 3600 feet; in Brazil, at 5000; in the Caucasus, at 8000; in Abyssinia, at 10,000; in Peru and

An acrobat in a Spokane (Wash.)

theatre fell from a height, landing upon and setiously injuring a spectator. The spectator sued the manager

The Duke of Cumberland, only son and heir of the late King George of Hanover, was born without a nose.

He is a man of singularly enlightened

Quebec has its name from an Algonquin word signifying "take care of the rock." There was a dangerous reef in the river opposite the place where the American craft and ingenuity is appreciated even in South Africa. There is now in course of construction in

New York City an immease passenger elevator which is to be placed in a sky-scraping building in Johnannis-

Dutch military cycling volunteers have to pass a real examination before they are accepted for the maneuvers, but when passed they get five florins a day, first-class traveling fare, and are loaged as officers at the expense of the

In the excavations in England on the site of the supposed Roman villa one of the most interesting discoveries is the elaborate system of warming by heated air. In several places the arrangement of fines is in perfect con-

A Portland (Mo.) man years ago left his property to his two sons. They divided it by lot, one getting valuable downtown property, the other uptown lots of less value. But the city grew, and now the second man's holdings

A man died recently near Lebanon,

Penn., at ninety-two years of age. He had been the father of twenty-two children, fifteen of whom survived him. There were besides, at the time of his death, 110 grandchildren and

The Ingham County (Michigan) Circuit Court concerned itself two days, Monday and Tuesday, in a litigation involving a calf, valued at $18.

Wednesday and Thursday the court settled a sheep case, where the difference between the parties was fifty ninety-six great-grandchildren.

are the most valuable.

ance in California they were worth faces and names of all who attended

So, while honors and emoluments proceed by himself.

make his defense.

his discourses.

$1.20 per pound.

stition of sailors.

Bolivia, at 11,000.

and received $800.

and progressive mind.

city was afterward built.

State.

dition.

cents.

seven different languages.

and reproduce most of it.

Finland and New Caledonia.

suspected wife.

fain would have escaped. "You, who have listened to every word that passed RECENT WRINKLES ON THE FACE OF DAME FASHION. between that base man and me, can give back my lord his lost faith-dare not Welcome Retura of Buttons-Silk the Fabric for Early Season Wear-Possible Forerunner of Hoopskirts.

THE world seems to have gone wild on the subject of ornamentation, says the Washington Star. There is no stone too precious to imitate for every-day garniture, and silver is so common and so cheap that the charwoman would be frowned upon in the swell West End scullery regions if she were to pinion her Bath bun headdress with anything grosser than a silver dagger. The new throat or collar buckles are not so barbarously wide as they were for awhile, but they are longer and joined to this yoke, that flare very prettier. Some of them look like much from the knees down, giving a crocheted silver wire, and are flexible. like spreading effect to the dress skirt A few are set with brilliants, but worn above it. A few of these skirts though these are really worn by some are silk covered." It is thought among people of unquestioned good taste in importers that these skirts are forebroad daylight over a tailor-made runners of hoop skirts. gown, it is yet open to question whether it is quite proper. Bracelets for early season wear. Merchants of heavy silver log chains, fastened quote enormous sales of the very light with a tiny padlock, are not new in conception, but are in design. They the darker ones for wear after Easter. are not pretty either.

be at its height. The bodice still has grain will push it hard. There are three inches wide. Inexpensive skirts are also made of moreen or haircloth alone, some fashioned with a closely fitted yoke, with kilts or box plaits

Silk will be the fabric of all fabrics Taffetas, so durable and light, will The reign of fancy bodices seems to hold their own, but surah and gros a fancy for stopping at the waist line, some odd fancies in evening silks with flat, square buckles, set in a ly do launder remarkably well. The silk, and have dainty bows of ribbon looking. with small rhinestone buckles in the centre. There are tiny rings of silver set with tiny stones, that may be sewed on the belt to form a chain of brilliants through the centre, or to stud it at intervals. Except on very brilliant occasions, these would look a little loud. Buttons seem to be returning to favor, and they will be welcome, for bad as dressmakers hate to make buttonholes, they would rather do it than submit to the constant growl about hooks that never stay fastened, and eyes that elude the most skillful fingers. Some of the buttons are exquisite pieces of workmanship, and are of filagree gold and silver. A few are set with real garnets and turquoises, and the most artistically expensive ones are painted ivory or stone china, set in quaintly wrought rims. The vests of tailor-made gowns that have fly-open coats are fastened from neck to lower edge with neat little buttons, generally of the same material as the Large pearl buttons are a feature of the modernized Eton suits, which are with us again. There is just enough difference in the suit of the new garments to make you wish that you had waited till this season to buy. One fancy in the jacket is to hook it to the vest down the sides, and not let it fly open, as it did last season. It will not be hard to accommodate the old style to that feature, however. As for the sleeves, they can't get any bigger, for there is nothing to hold them out, except it be a wire cage. . I did hear of one young woman who utilized her big men will look funny then!

DAINTY COSTUME FOR HOME ENTERTAINMENT.

let embroidery is fastened, which is the shops. finished at the waist line by a broad Yokes of lace, with deep berthas all the new shades, are stylish trimmed | velvet ribbon collar. with coarse black lace insertion.

altogether as a lining, employing the full over the waist line. crinoline, moreen, haircloth or other fabric for an entirely separate underwith piped or corded silk frills, about | $1900 at auction.

hence new ideas in belts are brought shown, the "seersucker" silk, and forward every day. A fine wire chain gauffre crepe being the very latest. belt, as flexible as ribbon almost, has They are used principally for bodices, a buckle of two hearts that overlap made up with lace and rich passemenand are set with turquoises. Another trie. The cheap wash silks come in belt is of a thin blade of chased silver the most charming colors and certaincurious oriental fashion with various are even illuminated now, and a few colored stones. Ribbon belts come to of them have a curious cord woven in match all the exquisite new shades of stripes which makes them quite rich

Since the crusade against the theatre and concert hat began all kinds of devices have been resorted to to save.

CONCERT HATS.

the appearance of going abroad bareheaded. Some of the jeweled affairs that are used for this purpose are simply exquisite. One to be put against a rabbit's ear bow of ribbon is of dead gold set with turquoises; the other is an aigrette on a pair of Mercury wings of gold set with pearls. The center pearl is set around with diamonds. Both of these ornaments are made to stand against a high knotted coiffure.

SMART COLLARS AND CAPES.

Broad, deep collars or short capes sleeves on a rainy, sloppy day to stow of heavy lace are very handsome over her packages in, and they might be close-fitting waists. They come at all made to serve as market baskets, but prices, but are never very cheap. One it is quite probable that they have of the new fashious is to have a collar reached the highest point of all their made with six points of lace. Around greatness, and will soon fall, like a each point is sewed, full, a finer lace, bright exhalation in the evening, and about three inches in width. The neck no man see them more. My, but wo is finished with a folded chiffon collar, or ribbon, as is preferred. The col-The fancy fronts which are so much lar, made in this fashion, is very the vogue show many novelties for dressy. It covers the front and back spring. Those made of the English of the waist to the bust line and stands eyelet embroidery and ribbons are out well over the full sleeve. These among the latest. To a pink satin collars can be made for much less stock a blouse front of pale pink eye- money than they can be bought for in band of pink ribbon. Other novel- attached, are very smart little affairs ties are of eyelet insertion and bands to wear over a high cut waist or to of ribbon. These fronts are very cover the neck and shoulders when a charming worn with jaunty little low cut bodice is worn. They, too, cloth jackets. Light silk fronts, in are finished with a chiffon, satin or Long, full, straight vest pieces of

Here is some French authority on chiffon and lace insertion are exthe use of crinoline: "The best dress- tremely becoming. The chiffon is full makers are now using stiff interlinings and laid in fine plaits. The piece of with great moderation. There is a lace inserton goes between the folds of general tendency to discard its use the chiffon, and the whole thing hangs

A sheet of pen drawings by Michael skirt. Some of the new silk skirts are Angelo was discovered recently in a made to carry out this idea, being London auction room. The subjects faced with haircloth at the hem, and were sketches for holy tamilies and trimmed very full around the bottom allegorical groups. The prize brought Senator Hawley as a Singer. "Calm and sedate," says the Wash ington Post, "appears Senator Haw-ley upon the floor of the Senate. When he speaks, his voice is pleasant, but it does not recall the sounding brass or the tinkling cymbals. Very different is the Senator Hawley who joins in gleeful or patriotic song with his old comrades of the war. Then he is an enthusiastic, fervent chorister. He swings his arms as he beats time, and from his throat pours forth a Niagara of melody. The air quivers with tuneful sounds and echoes with dispason notes. When he mounts up on a chair and sings 'My Country 'Tie of Thee,' as he did the other night a the Loyal Legion banquet, it is a sight and an occasion to stir the coldest heart. But even this is as an ant to an elephant compared with his rendition of 'Marching Through Georgia.' Then is the climax reached. The atmosphere palpitates, the heart beats tumultuously, an infectious enthusiasm intoxicates the crowd. Senator Hawley as a singer beats the world."

UNITED STATES SENATOR HAWLEY.

And the Doctor Kicked Himself. A very eminent physician had cured a little child from a dangerous illness.

The thankful mother turned her steps toward the house of her son's savior. "Doctor," said she, "there are some services which cannot be repaid. I did not know how to express my gratitude. I thought you would, perhaps, be so kind as to accept this purse, embroidered by my own hands."

"Madam," replied the doctor, roughly, "medicine is no trivial affair, and our visits are only to be rewarded in money. Small presents serve to sustain friendship, but they do not sustain our families."

"But, doctor," said the lady, alarmed and wounded, "speak; tell me the fee."

"Four hundred dollars, madam." The lady opens the purse, takes out five bank notes of $200 each, gives two to the doctor, puts the remaining three back in her purse, bows coldly and departs.—Amusing Journal.

Cycling on Railway Ties.

One of the curiosities in the bicycle line is an invention by a young Cali-fornian named J. W. Ritchey. It is a machine for pedaling along railway tracks, and the inventor claims for it a speed of from twenty to twenty-five miles an hour. The means by which Ritchey has adapted the familiar roadster to the gauge of a railway are as follows: He has attached a four-incb flanged wheel, shaped exactly like a large spool, to a rod in front of the hind wheel, and a similar one on an arm projecting about three feet in front. In addition to this an eight. een-inch wheel at the end of a rod so arranged as not to interfere with the working of the pedals, runs on the other rail. In this way the machine is perfectly balanced, and all the rider has to do is to work the pedals in the usual way. The inventor seems to believe that before long semi-deserted passenger trains will be followed by an endless procession of "bikes," on which idle conductors and despairing news agents will gaze helplessly from the rear platform, but just how the objections of railway companies to such use of their tracks is to be overcome is not vouchsafed.

CYCLING ON THE RAIL

Business Aphorisms.

Big debts come from big promises. Leaks in business are like gimlet holes in a barrel. Little ideas and big successes never go together. A careless merchant will have careless customers. A neat store and neatly printed stationery go together. If excuse had a money value, some men would be wealthy. Success is very coy and will remain only when treated well.

Place your confidence upon actual cash and you don't misplace it. Some clerks cultivate their mustaches more carefully than they do business sense. -Shoe and Leather

. A Napoleonic Mot. One night at a court ball in the Tulleries Napoleon III. was so attentive to a beautiful young woman as to excite comment among the other women. At last, in response a direct tribute to her beauty, she said:

"Ah, but Your Majesty compliments me too much." "How remarkable," he replied, with a twinkle in his eye, "that you should say just what every other woman here is thinking."—Detroit Free Press.

The Federal Government of Mexico offers a bonus of four cents for every rubber tree planted. In addition to this, the State Government of Oaxaca offers one cent.